Employee-Owned Skyline Construction Named One of Wall Street Journal's Top Small Workplaces for 2009

San Francisco, CA (September 28, 2009) – The Wall Street Journal and Winning Workplaces selected Skyline Construction as one of the 15 Top Small Workplaces in America out of nearly 630 nominations from the public, private and nonprofit sectors.

"We became a 100% employee-owned company in 2005 to foster an ownership culture," said Skyline Construction CEO and President David Hayes. "This prestigious award demonstrates that Skyline's first priority is its employees and that our team remains as cohesive as ever despite the economic recession."

The Top Small Workplaces list is compiled in a partnership between The Wall Street Journal and Winning Workplaces, a nonprofit that helps small and midsize organizations create better workplaces. The list showcases exceptional employers that have built workplace environments that foster teamwork, flexibility and professional growth while providing an atmosphere and benefits that encourage employee loyalty.

"The ownership culture has been ingrained into Skyline Construction's core," noted Hayes, who offers shares to all employees including unionized laborers and other front-line workers. He and his management team share financial information and hold regular meetings to address workplace issues. In addition, one employee from every department participates in an annual two-day retreat where the company develops its strategic goals for the year ahead.

"Skyline Construction has always been committed to the well-being and personal and professional development of its people," added Hayes. "They are our greatest asset and thanks to them, we expect to emerge from the economic downturn stronger than ever."
